American Dante Bibliography for 1981
Anthony L. Pellegrini

This bibliography is intended to include the Dante translations published in this country in 1981 and all Dante studies and reviews published in 1981 that are in any sense American.

Translations

According to his preface, “On Translating Dante” (pp. 35-43), the translator takes as his purpose “to convey Dante’s meaning into English,” and so forgoes the distorting use of rhyme and even takes liberties with the verse-length, varying it between thirteen syllables and nine, but observing the tercet division. The verse translation alone was first published in England in 1980 (Manchester: Carcanet New Press Limited); the translation with introduction, commentary, notes, and bibliography was first published in England in 1981 (Pan Books Limited). (For a review, see below, under Reviews).

As with the Inferno (see Dante Studies, XC, 175; for reviews, XCI, 180, XCII, 199, and XCIII, 245), the version is in blank verse preserving the tercet divisions and furnished with a narrative abstract preceding and interpretative notes following each canto. A list of “References” is provided at the end. (For reviews, see below.)

The well known version is reprinted from the 1913 edition (Oxford University Press). See also below, under Studies: The Early Italian Poets.

As he explains in his introduction, the translator favors a literal rendering, even to preserving incongruities in Dante’s original. He offers a new theory and interpretation of what he considers the deliberate confusion that Dante created in the De Vulgari Eloquentia and resolved,

Studies

Describes in Dante’s presentation of figures and icons from the sphere of Mars upward in the Paradiso the composite image, conceptually, of a chalice. The idea finds support, iconographically, in a type of historiated chalice widespread in Italy by Dante’s time, which was composed of many elements similar to those of the poet’s paradisal program. If the Eucharist may be seen as the poem’s conclusion, then the image of the chalice is plausible and valid.

Includes in the introduction a brief discussion of Dante’s relationship to this Provencal poet of Dantean interest. Contents: Introduction, Select Bibliography, The Poetry of Arnaut Daniel [text of nineteen poems and verse translation facing], Textual Notes, Glossary of Special Words, Index to Names in Arnaut’s Poetry, Index of Opening Lines, Musical Appendix, and Folios 39-41 from MS A. Illustrations are reproduced in half-tone, including manuscript text and musical accompaniments with modern transcripts of the latter.

Relates the various narrative, psychological, and linguistic elements of metamorphosis in Inferno XXIV to each other and to the larger context of the whole poem, of which metamorphosis is the central structural metaphor, as illustrated, for example, by the image of the “angelica farfalla” (Purg. X, 121-129). The example of Vanni Fucci’s repeated metamorphosis of stagnant circularity stands in poignant contrast to the wayfarer’s positive metamorphosis through conversion and gradual, continual transformation of his vision in the poem.

Examines the polysemous use of pietas and pius in the Aeneid and of pieta, pio, and pietoso in the Commedia, and from a close comparison, sometimes in the light of certain parallelisms (as in Anchises’ greeting to Aeneas [VI, 687f.] and Inf. II, 4f.) reflecting a conflation of meanings, contends, contrary to the accepted critical position, that Dante indeed draws on the Latin associations of pietas in reinforcement of typological effects in his poem.

Barber, Joseph A. “The Role of the Other in Dante’s Vita Nuova.” In Studies in Philology, LXXVIII, No. 2 (1981), 128-137.

Contends that besides the three principals, Beatrice, Amore, and the poetlover, there is a further important character, a collective “other” or altrui made up of the fedeli d’amore, gentle ladies, and the peregrini, who serve to enlarge the scope of Beatrice’s significance in the Vita Nuova from the traditional privacy of the love event to the public domain. The often noted intermingling of identities in the work helps the poet define the role of the “other” and even implies a circle of identities—Amore, Beatrice, donne. More important, the author concludes that Beatrice is identifiable with the other in the resulting expanded meaning that she comes for all.

Elaborates on the parallelism between the journey of Dante as Everyman and Ulysses from the contextual and spiritual standpoint of the poem, noting particularly the point at which the two journeys diverge, the point where the wayfarer comes to his senses, eventually passes his test in humility, and accepts Virgil’s heaven-initiated aid, while Ulysses, even as he recognizes his being lost persists in his outward journey with pride and daring. The author stresses the presence of the water image in both journeys and also the respective analogical pairings of guidance, Virgil to Dante, Ulysses to his followers, and Dante to his reader, with Ulysses providing the point of contrast by persisting in his manifold sinning of evil counsel, pursuit of experience as such, disobedience of higher law, and pride.

Contains a chapter on “The Life of Dante and the Lectures on the Comedy” (pp. 214-229), treating of Boccaccio’s interest in and writings on Dante, with an account of the differences in these writings.

Points out that in his search for the new, but grafted upon the traditional, Dino Campana was much indebted to Dante, whom the poet considered as best representing the fusion of Nordic and Latin cultures. In illustration of Campana’s indebtedness, the author cites many Dantine parallels, echoes, and borrowings in the Canti orfici, associating in particular the Notte and the Verna with the Inferno and the Purgatorio, respectively, not to mention parallels with the Vita Nuova as well.

Boucher, Holly Wallace. “Metonymy in Typology and Allegory, with a Consideration of Dante’s Comedy.” In Allegory, Myth and Symbol, Harvard English Studies, 9, edited by Morton Distinguishes between the tropes of metaphor (the object substituted for the thing) and metonymy (replacement of one name for another), and recalls that the early definition of allegory allows for other ingredients in allegory besides metaphor (as in non-metaphoric allegory), concluding that a typological allegory may consist of continued metonymy. According to the author, the Christian typology of the Divine Comedy consists of metonymic relationships, such as in the substitution of part for whole, or whole for part, and in the general continuities implied by the Christian concept of time, of God, and even man as the subject of typology as it unfolds in history. Such aspects of Dante’s poem as the journey, the exemplum, and the contrapasso are interpreted as metonymic in the typological structure of the poem. Indeed, the view of the poetic journey as a metaphor has been considered inadequate because, the author submits, “the journey depends on a principle of coherence of time and space and person which belongs only to metonymy.” She uses the Paolo and Francesca canto (Inf; V) to illustrate how the typology of Dante’s Comedy works on metonymic, rather than metaphoric, principles.

Doctoral dissertation, New York University, 1981. 166 p. (“... the poetic techniques . . . conform to the content . . . and arise directly from the narrative necessities of the content.”)

Includes discussion of Dante’s poetry (esp. Purg. III, IV, and V) as a model of Eliot’s Wasteland for illustrating the shaping power of the controlling image for organizing emotion and narrative.

Marshals massive evidence from Scripture and the exegetes, such as St. Augustine, St. Thomas, St. Gregory, and Richard of St. Victor, to show that Ulysses, is not the ambiguous figure with a bias of virtue claimed by so many critics, but the very exemplar indicated by his location in the eighth bolgia. Many textual details of allusion and metaphor utilized by the poet are clarified in this interpretation. All the actions of Dante’s Ulysses figure are incontrovertibly typical of dissemblers. “Ulysses, far from being the exceptional paragon of virtue imagined by romantic-minded critics, was chosen by the Poet as the exemplary ambitious, dissembling pretender to noble counsel, one whose aims and posturing advice were as deceptive as the rest of the ‘lordura’ held in this ditch of Malebolge.”

Lists alphabetically over 300 items limited to the period 1800-1981 and excluding ephemera, such as newspaper articles.

Contends, on the basis of perceived bipartite and tripartite structural parallels with Virgil’s Aeneid and the specific distribution of cantos and spheres in the cantica, that the Paradiso reveals concentricity and heliocentricity, with the sun thereby seen as an important element for structure as well as for theme, image, and symbol.

Cecchetti, Giovanni. “‘Per te poeta fui, per te cristiano’ (Purg. XXII, 73).” In Pacific Coast Philology, XVI, No. 2 (1981), 25-32.

Construes Purgatorio XVII, along with XXI, as a key episode, echoing the initial encounter with Virgil in Inferno I and reinforcing the exaltation of poetry as the noblest manifestation of the human spirit built by Dante into the whole Commedia. Specifically, Statius is seen as a figura Christi, a poet and savior—what Virgil was for Statius, and what Dante wants to be for all humanity. Also, functioning as Dante’s alter ego, Statius is a figura Dantis, in further celebration of poets, and specifically Dante himself as well.

Contends that in the Comedy Dante writes as if he has participated in the inner life of God, that we must broaden the traditional understanding of mimesis as the key structure of the poem, that the poet can love God and write what he wishes, as his efforts are directed to God as their final end. Besides transcending its own beauty to help man rise above his preoccupation with created goods through conversion and a renewal of spiritual vision with a reordering of the will, the composition of the Comedy has a major counterplot in its effect on the poet himself, constituting his epistrophic return to God. In achieving these ends, the poem “offers an immanent apologia by calling attention to its own structure, a structure created in imitation of the Logos.” The work is cast in five essays discussing many episodes in the three cantiche to address ethical and aesthetic matters based on the fundamental notion of conversion. Contents: Preface—Introduction: [I] Reading the Divine Comedy; II. Dantesque Miraculism: Autonomy and Heteronomy—Chapter One: Francesca da Rimini: From the Intransitive Moment to the Point—Chapter Two: The Mediations of Unlikeness: The Punishment of the Thieves—Chapter Three: The Logos of Visible Speech; I. The Entry to Purgatory; II. The Panels; III. Visible Speech; Chapter Four: I. Dante’s Poetics of Reformation; II. The Strategies of Reformation. Each essay is divided into detailed sub-sections.

Examines the two images in light of Patristic commentary linking Christ to the traditional metaphors of musical harmony and the “good physician” and proceeds to discuss the problem of the salvation of the two pagans Trajan and Ripheus. The author concludes that in the case of Ripheus Dante had recourse to St. Thomas’ concept of penitential baptism (Summa Theol. III.lxvi.2).

Presents the marginal corrections penciled by Charles Eliot Norton in his personal copy (now in the Houghton Library of Harvard University) of Vincenzio Nannucci’s edition of the Pietro Alighieri Commentarium to the Comedy (Florentiae: apud Angelum Garinei, MDCCCXLV) for their usefulness until a new edition becomes available. This is already in progress by an American scholar and based on over twenty known manuscripts of the Commentarium compared with the three utilized by Nannucci.

Costa, Dennis. Irenic Apocalypse: Some Uses of Apocalyptic in Dante, Petrarch and Rabelais. [Saratoga, Calif.:] ANMA Libri, 1981. iv, 144 p. (Stanford French and Italian Studies, XXI.)

Contains a chapter on Dante, “Learning to Read Irenically,” in the context of his theme of the “irenic” or peaceful aspects (qualifying the violent, horrific aspect) of the biblical book of Apocalypse, which is proposed here as “the literary type of Christian eschatology,” characterizing in turn the traditional literature that describes the anticipation of Paradise. Irenic imagery is found to prevail in the process of signification and interpretation structurally from Purgatorio XXVII through the Paradiso, reflecting the point of view acquired by Dante-pilgrim at the end of the second cantica and rooted in the ascetic/aesthetic of Apocalypse as Dante’s context for interpretation. Conflated are the ecclesial presentation of general salvation history and Dante’s particular salvation history. The author goes on to apply the irenic-apocalyptic context established by Dante in the final cantos of the Purgatorio to the problem of interpretation in Paradiso X-XIV, and evolves the structural logic of Dante’s irenic confidence in language, with its traditional Christian confidence in the ultimate transcendent inheritance. Contents: 1. Irenic Apocalypse; 2. Revelation: The Text as Acceptable Sacrifice; 3. Learning to Read Irenically; 4. Petrarch: De legendo Deo; 5. Daily Bread: The “Horrible Mysteries” of Rabelais; Selected Bibliography.

Reviews briefly the varying course of Dante criticism over the centuries from the earliest commentators to the present, with specific reference to Inferno V as illustrative example. The author cites certain gains of recent years, such as the enhanced understanding of Francesca through better information, increased exploration of the Romanesque background, increased awareness of pitfalls surrounding a memorable text, availability of Petrocchi’s critical edition, the distinction between Dante poet and Dante pilgrim, and a return to an allegorizing reading. He ends with the admonition that any new interpretative intuition must respect philological soundness.

Contends that when Ezra Pound wrote Canto 74, line 425 (“when Lucifer fell in N. Carolina”) he had in mind Inferno XXXIV, 121-126, and points out other Dantesque echoes in this “Pisan” canto.

Addresses the difficulty of reading the Comedy because of the loss to modern readers of its sacramental nature, i.e., recognition that all things reflect the glory of God Who speaks to us through and in things. To enhance understanding of Dante’s view of the world the author examines how Dante deals with the problem of the One and the Many, his theme of love within the poem’s context and imagery, and the mystery-laden figure of Beatrice as coordinating focus of Dante’s complex of ideas and essence of his sacramental vision. The three-fold approach deals with “the world as sacrament,” “the poem as sacrament,” and “Beatrice as sacrament,” focusing especially on Paradiso XXXIII. Creativity and divine activity, power, and love are all inter-associated in the poem’s celebration of man and the Other, with the effect that Dante’s sacramental art awakens spirit and senses to contemplation and wonder.

Presents a brief history of the Dante Society and its activities from the time of Longfellow and his translation of the Divine Comedy and the local “Dante Club” that was prompted by that effort, to the eventual incorporation of the society as a national organization and its accompanying growth in world-wide scholarly importance.

Durling, Robert M. “Deceit and Digestion in the Belly of Hell.” In Allegory and Representation, Selected Papers from the English Institute, 1979-80 (New Series, No. 5), edited,
Considering the metaphors based on food, nourishment, digestion, and generation used by Dante throughout the Commedia and in light of supporting references among certain ancient writers (e.g., Seneca) as well as medieval commentators (e.g., St. Augustine), the author, from a whole pattern he sees in various parts of the Inferno corresponding analogically to parts of the human body, contends that the area of fraud in Malebolge corresponds metaphorically to the belly, digestion, generation, and expulsion—all related analogically, in turn, to money and wealth and the body politic, as well as to the body of Satan as antithetical counterpart of the body of Christ and the Church. The figure of Mastro Adamo, then, in his punishment represents counterfeiting as a disease, reflected in his own bodily condition as a mirror in turn of his soul, and by extension, a resulting distemper of the digestive system of the body politic, as fraud violates the natural bond of love that should obtain in society. Dante’s allegorical method here is seen to focus and combine religious, metaphysical, cosmic, social, moral considerations in representations of the human body. Drawing upon ancient and medieval exegetical sources, Professor Durling underscores the parallels between poetry itself and the metaphors of digestion-generation combining with the various possibilities of counterfeiting and deceit, especially as relating to the outward (bodily) lying and the violation of the natural trust among men on which society is based. For example, the cantos of the Purgatorio corresponding to Inferno XIX-XXVII of Malebolge, while referring literally to the purification of avarice, gluttony, and lust, figuratively refer to spiritual wealth, food, and creativeness, equally liable to distortion, as they develop the parallelism between the physical body and the soul’s other modes of expression, especially poetry. In fact, it is here that Dante makes his most direct statement on his poetics (Purg. XXV, 49-63). The poet, in effect, has to speak through the poem as an extension of his own body. “Dante’s central metaphors for poetry, as for fraud, derive from the two chief vital functions of the body, nutrition and generation, because for him man is a song-making animal by the same token that he is an embodied spirit.” (p. 84) “The gift of poetry is rooted in physical expressiveness.” (p. 85) In a poem so serious and ambitious, the problem Dante faced in striving to understand and digest the experience of his own life and his own time was particularly ambiguous and difficult, becoming the problem of the relation between allegory and deceit.

Elaborates in further detail on his previous position of drawing a correlation between the parts of Dante’s Hell and the parts of the human body, and more specifically and poignantly the body of Satan as an infernal parody of the body of Christ. In this analogy, Inferno X and the heretics would correspond to the human breast and heart, the latter being traditionally considered the seat of faith and wisdom, against which heresy sins. The representation of Farinata and Cavalcante are related antithetically to the iconographic “Imago pietatis” figuring the dead Christ from the waist up in a moment of suspension between life and death and as such representing a Eucharistic symbol. Farinata and Cavalcante in their respective magnanimity and pusillanimity, or impassive resignation and fleshly despair, represent the Stoic and Epicurean, who shared the basic error of limiting man’s goal to this life. Farinata and Cavalcante have turned away from the revelation of the Creator in the visible world and therefore each appears as a distorted imitatio Christi. Beyond this clustering of iconographical references to the Revelation and the Eucharist, the author mentions parallel connections with corresponding cantos in the Purgatorio and Paradiso yet to be treated elsewhere, limiting himself here to closing with a brief discussion of the link between the Eucharist, the heart, and the sun as supported by previous literary, biblical, and theological tradition.

The well-known work is photographically reproduced from the 1913 edition of Rossetti’s Poems and Translations 1850-1870 (Oxford University Press), which “is generally closer to the 1861 edition than to the 1874 revision” (Note on the Text, p. xxiv). It contains Rossetti’s version of the Vita Nuova and selected further lyrics of Dante (see above, under Translations), as well as translations of other early Italian poets, all in the original metre. There is a foreword by John Wain (pp. xv-xvi) and an introduction by Sally Purcell (pp. xvii-xxiii).

Analyzes William Butler Yeats’s interest in and use of Dante primarily in his prose writings, and more specifically in A Vision, in the decade 1915-1925. It seems that Yeats, who knew Dante only in English translation, was impressed less by the content of the Divine Comedy than the formal design, in which work however he envisioned a Dante at variance with reality, a Dante wearing the mask of solitude, of the anti-self, really of Yeats’s own fashioning to answer a personal psychological need, a Dante on which to model his own life as an Imitatio Dantis. Beyond the “hieroglyphics” of A Vision, the author sees the ultimate justification of Yeats’s Dante to lie in the poems he wrote in the last third of his life.

Present a reconstructed design of the Capuan Gate (no longer extant), built under Emperor Frederick II between 1234 and 1239, and point out allusive parallels in Inferno XIII, 58-75, in clarification of Dante’s figure of Pier della Vigna.

Reprint of the well-known work, originally published in 1953 (Princeton University Press) and subsequently reprinted in paperback in 1968 (Princeton Paperbacks in Language and Literature). (See 68th to 72nd Reports, 45-46, and see Dante Studies, LXXXVII, 157; widely reviewed.)

Touches on a number of Dantean echoes in the context of his theme emphasizing that Tennyson’s grief and consolation over the death of his friend Hallam reflected in the poem, “Ulysses,” is colored by Homeric and Dantean literary memory.

Assesses Binyon’s translation of the Divina Commedia as most nearly reproducing “the total quality of the original poem” by its accuracy and Dantean tone, even to recapturing the effect of terza rima; relates the story of its making and of the acquaintance through correspondence between Binyon and Ezra Pound over the translation which the latter found to his liking while he made many helpful criticisms and suggestions for improving it; laments the lack of commercial success of the Binyon version and hence its very limited availability; and ends with a comparison of Binyon’s translation with that, also in terza rima, by Dorothy Sayers, which by contrast has found remarkable favor and is constantly reprinted.

Examines a problem especially widespread at the time of Dante, viz., the reaction of medieval thinkers and poets whose suspect ideas were in conflict with the general religious, political, and social ambience. Contents (by major headings): Introduction; I. Du monde politique en philosophie; II. L’Islam et la redécouverte de la philosophie politique; III. La Philosophie politique dans le monde chrétien; IV. Dante et l’allégorie philosophique; V. L’Impérialisme de la Comédie; VI. Dante et le christianisme; VII. La Théorie de la double vérité; VIII. Le Déclin de la philosophie politique; Appendice: Saint Basile et l’Hellénisme; Bibliographie. (For reviews, see below.)

Offers an interpretative reading of the Inferno as a work that “has given me the fullest realization of what literature is,” and as a work of perpetual relevance, “a work of such plenitude and totality that it is capable of reflecting and absorbing experiences that come to its readers today or at any time.” The series of thirty-four brief chapters, canto by canto, is preceded by an introduction (“Personal thoughts on Reading the Inferno”; “Background for the Reading”), including comments on the significance of the Inferno for the modern reader and some comparative remarks on the twentieth-century masterpieces of Proust and Joyce in relation to Dante’s Inferno. The book concludes with a “Note on Reading Dante Today,” including brief remarks on how the Divine Comedy has been-variously read in the past, on the modern reader’s necessary adjustment to Dante’s recognition of a created and ordered world, and on further points of comparison with Ulysses and A la recherche du temps perdu. Includes a short “Selected Bibliography” and an index.

Comments briefly on some Dantean echoes in Sinclair Lewis’ novel, Babbitt.

Reports on three medieval liturgical dramas (Officium Peregrinorum, Visitatio Sepukhri, and Resuscitatio Lazari) associated with Easter as sung in recent presentations at Princeton University, and points out how such Latin plays influenced medieval and modern literature through the international language created by them. Examples include echoes of the pilgrim tale of Luke 24 in Purgatorio II and XXI, and even in the very pilgrim figure assumed by the poet questing the Truth; in illuminations of Virgil and Dante in the Inferno are found iconographic echoes of Cleophas and Luke.

Cites Inferno VIII, 70-73, as an earlier echo, among others, of Egypt in its typological association with infernality, as reflected in Milton’s Paradise Lost I, 717-719.

Examines many ways of pilgrimage in which James Joyce used the mode of figura, a technique partly learned from Dante’s pilgrim text, the Divine Comedy, particularly in the novel Ulysses, seen here as “an incarnational game of flesh and words.”

House, Richard H. (Joint Author). “Nimrod the Astronomer.” See Livesay, Steven J....

Relates Inferno X, 63, to Vita Nuova XXIV, suggesting that Dante’s allusion to Cavalcanti’s (former) lady, Giovanna, as Primavera was in part an attempt to bring his “first friend” back into the courtly fold, with Giovanna in this context understood as a John the Baptist for Cavalcanti too, leading him to Beatrice/Christ as well. Such a reading helps resolve the crux of Guido’s “disdain.”

Given the mass of confusing and at times contradictory, even distorting, criticism accumulated around the Commedia, the author suggests it is time more attention were paid to Dante’s self-exegesis built into his works. Dante is obviously seen to be his own commentator in the Vita Nuova and the Convivio. This is true also in the Commedia in which he integrates the device of the parallel episode common to biblical exegesis, where the second related episode clarifies the full meaning of the first. The paired episodes of Guido and Buonconte da Montefeltro, of Pier della Vigna and Romeo di Villanova, and others come readily to mind. But Professor Iannucci dwells at length upon the much debated and often misconstrued episode of Brunetto Latini (Inf. XV) whose full significance is resolved by that of Oderisi da Gubbio (Purg. XI) which definitively destroys Brunetto’s reasoning about what constitutes glory and immortality. Even when he does not provide a parallel episode as such Dante builds hints into his poem to guide us to create our own edifying parallel episodes.

Contends that, despite the exhaustive work of Toynbee and others, there may well be yet undiscovered further instances of Dantean echoes in English literature, and cites a hitherto overlooked close parallel with the opening tercet of Inferno I in Arthur’s dream of the Wheel of Fortune in the Middle English alliterative Morte Arthure (Anon.).

Review-article that considers briefly the interest in Dante in English during the twentieth century since the Temple Classics Dante and comments on recent translations of the Divine Comedy by C.H. Sisson, Mark Musa, C.S. Singleton, and Allen Mandelbaum and their respective commentaries, published and/or projected.

Construes Dante’s treatment of violence in Circle 7 of the Inferno as modeled referentially on the paradigm of the Aristotelian chain of being, where man is recognized to participate metaphorically in all levels. The interpretation is deemed to help also to resolve the ambiguity surrounding the concept of matta bestialitade. By so structuring the seventh circle, Dante analogically portrays man’s falling away from God in successive stages from rational being to vegetative to mineral and elemental. Dante here unifies the triple division of a complex sin thus presented, exceptionally in the Inferno, on a single plane; expresses the gradation of evil, absent the usual means of the cantica: and effects a distinction between the categories of Violence and Fraud, marked by injury to man and society respectively. Also, Circle 6, where Heresy is seen as a denial of immortality, prepares the way for Circle 7 in the same declension of evil modeled on the chain of being.

The introduction includes ample reference to Dante, together with Brunetto, with whose life his was so intertwined, as well as a discussion of parallels between the Commedia and the Tesoretto. Contents: Introduction, Select Bibliography, Il Tesoretto (the Little Treasure), La penetenza (Penance), Art Appendix, and Index of Names. There are eighteen half-tone illustrations, mostly from the illuminations in Strozzi 146, Biblioteca laurenziana.

Contends that critics like Auerbach misrepresent Dante’s portrayal of the after-life in concretely human terms, because they are blinded by a too modern, aesthetic, even mechanical view of the divine order. Far from a rivalry between the natural and the divine, it is a case of humanity achieving perfection in God through the concrete yet mystical body transformed in Christ, based on the Incarnation. The abstracting bias of Auerbach’s approach leads to a misinterpretation of the Commedia. The key is Dante’s Christian faith that the creature can attain ultimate and intensest reality in the beyond, the present life itself being the great figura of eternity.

Reacting against the by now deep-seated critical tendency to ignore the poet and focus upon the poem as an independent, virtually anonymous artifact, the author seeks to study a selected number of poets of various ages in relation to their works, in order to learn something about the making of poetry by examining the various stages common to poets’ careers. In this context, the author devotes a sectio to “La Vita Nuova” (pp. 20-34) as part of a chapter on “Initiation: Books of New Life,” and includes ample further references to Dante, passim. Contents: Preface: The Life of the Poet; Beginning: A First Look into Keats; I. Initiation: Books of New Life—La Vita Nuova—The Marriage of Heaven and Hell Per Amica Silentia Lunae; II. Harmonium: The Tradition of One and Four Quartets The Aeneid Faust Leaves of Grass The Death of Virgil; III. Tombeau: Jonson on Shakespeare Collins on Thomson Auden on Yeats; The Tombs of Mallarme: Poe Baudelaire Verlaine; Ending: This Living Hand Keats Lowell Rilke; Notes and Glosses; Index.

Focusing on the alternate tradition of the figure of Nimrod as astronomer, manifest in the Liber Nimrod (c. 9th-11th cent.), the authors trace the manuscript tradition, transmission of the work, and its uses and influence. Referring briefly to the Liber in relation to Dante’s Nimrod in Inferno XXXI, which is consistent with the biblical and Augustinian tradition of the figure, they conclude negatively, arguing “not that Dante did not regard Nimrod as the image of unbridled love of knowledge, but that there is no evidence on either the literal or the allegorical level to indicate that Dante was using the Liber Nimrod as a source or that he knew of it.”

Acknowledges Dante’s greatness in his original handling of Purgatory both geographically and theologically, a figurative representation that has become our traditional and unique possession, but questions his bungling of the physical and religious geography of the East in the face of much available information for better resolving the difficult problem of the virtuous/guiltless infidel. This may be due to Dante’s drawing “an ‘ideological iron curtain’ between the Latin Christianity and the schismatic” and to his reputedly being conceited, aloof, and disdainful towards laymen (e.g., Marco Polo) who might have provided much useful information.

Stresses a parallel in the figure and role of Virgil in Dante’s Commedia and in Fulgentius’ Expositio continentiae Virgilianae secundum philosophos moralia, and suggests that Fulgentius’ Virgil deserves more study for a better understanding of Dante’s.

Point out various correspondence with Dante’s Inferno in James’s last tale (about New York), involving the title, setting, chronology, language, and characters. There is also a notable difference in that the lovers in James’s tale escape their hell, since for the modern Romantic writer damnation was not an eternal, irrevocable state.

Matt, Bernard Francis. “Quando amor mi spira: Virtue in Dante’s Purgatorio.” In Dissertation Abstracts International, XLI, No. 7 (1981), 3100A.

Doctoral dissertation, Emory University, 1980. 233 p. (In the rhetoric of the Purgatorio, the Pilgrim not only sees the souls purging themselves, but he also undergoes the process of sanctification and draws the reader into the formation of his own virtues as well.)

Focusing less on the literary content than “the union of its novel content with an ongoing new social role,” Professor Mazzaro examines the Vita Nuova as an image of its author, bringing to bear on the form of the work the notion of self, medieval ideas about memory, medieval theory of music, and St. Thomas. The study views Dante as a pioneer in modern autobiography, while shedding new light on Dante as artist in the context of contemporary cultural and religious developments. Contents: Preface; 1. The Vita Nuova and the “New” Poet; 2. The Vita Nuova and the Literature of Self; 3. The Architecture of the Vita Nuova; 4. The Prose of the Vita Nuova; 5. The “Dante” of the Vita Nuova; 6. The Vita Nuova and Subsequent Poetic Autobiography; Bibliography; Index. Chapters 1 and 6, here reprinted in revised form, previously appeared as “Dante’s The Vita Nuova and the ‘New’ Poet,” in La Fusta, II, No. 1 (Spring 1977), 17-40 (see Dante Studies, XCII, 186), and “The Fact of Beatrice in The Vita Nuova,” in The Literature of Fact: Selected Papers from the English Institute, edited with a foreword by Angus Fletcher (New York: Columbia University Press, 1976), pp. 83-108 (see Dante Studies, XCVI, 247).

Pays tribute to the Dante Society of America on its hundredth anniversary, citing the various activities and contributions of American students of Dante in the context of changing critical approaches marked between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, particularly the innovative interpretation represented by C.S. Singleton after the rather stagnant period between the two world wars. This address, delivered at a special celebratory meeting of the Dante Society in New York City on June 24, 1981, was followed by Professor Mazzoni’s paper entitled “I ‘battezzatori’ di Dante (Inf. XIX, 16-21),” which however was abruptly withdrawn because of newly discovered important further evidence necessitating a thorough revision of the presentation before it can be released for publication.

Finds discrepancies in the evidence pertaining to the Ulysses episode as presented by J.G. Truscott and David Thompson in their respective articles, “Ulysses and Guido (Inf. XXVI-XXVII)” (see Dante Studies, XCL, 47-72) and “A Note on Fraudulent Counsel” (see Dante Studies, XCII, 149-152). The author stresses that the gap left by Dante must not be filled by mechanically projecting back upon Ulysses in Canto XXVI the sin category applicable to Guido in Canto XXVII.

Cites hitherto neglected Dantean parallels in Percy’s novel, Lancelot, already anticipated in the epigraphic quotation from Purgatorio XXX, 136-139. In particular, the author notes echoes of Inferno V, even of the Vita Nuova, as well as the purgatorial role of Beatrice, and stresses the study of Dante as central to an accurate reading of Lancelot. Percy has learned from Dante “that the horror of sin is that it is powerfully seductive.”

Contends that Virgil is rebuked by the holy lady in the Siren episode (Purg. XIX) because, along with classical poetry generally he represents excessive attachment to beauty in itself, not as leading to the ultimate good. Christianity provides what is lacking to classical poetry: the rectification of the will, which is precisely the function of Purgatory, i.e., to effect the coincidence of the good and the beautiful. The process is consummated for Dante through the image of Beatrice in the Paradiso, where he is seen to become the new Virgil, or true guide to the good, not just the beautiful. This is consistent with the psychology of love presented in Purgatorio XVII-XVIII and XXI, as well as Aristotelian Ethics and metaphysics.

Examines the topos of the entranced gaze upon a significant image as both retarding pause and prefiguration of the goal in medieval and Renaissance literature, exemplified here by Perceval’s gaze upon the blood-drops in the snow in Chrétien de Troyes’ Conte du Graal, Dante’s transfixion on Beatrice in Purgatorio XXXII, 1-12, and Satan’s two contemplations of Eve in Paradise Lost. In the Dantean example, the instructional function fulfilled by Beatrice is eventually confirmed by repeated enactments of that rapt gaze throughout the Paradiso and poignantly recalled in Paradiso XXXIII, where “a poetry of absence, of nostalgia and desire, has been fulfilled into a poetry of presence.”

With brief analyses.

Analyzes the differing perspective on happiness in the Convivio and Monarchia, noting in particular (1) the different audiences addressed by the two works—in the more secular first, the middle class of chivalric gentility loyal to convention and interested in practical knowledge; in the less politically oriented second, the Church faithful (as in the Commedia) who seek the truth; and (2) the essentially different focus of the two works—the first based more on Aristotle’s Nichomachean Ethics and Politics and the second, on the Physics and Metaphysics. In the tension between theoretical and practical concerns, the Convivio yields to practical necessity within the political sphere, while the Monarchia focuses on the love of truth, which man’s higher nature may, it is hoped, translate into public use, even though the search for happiness here is viewed independently of political considerations. Where the Convivio emphasizes the link between happiness and political obligations of community, the Monarchia ties happiness to peace and freedom from mutual dependency, so that the first is local city-oriented, while the second looks to the larger peace-enhancing framework of universal empire. Thus, Dante moves from the Aristotelian certainty about linking happiness and politics (reflected in the modest middle-class happiness of the Convivio) to the perfect theoretical happiness of the Monarchia.

In light of Dante’s triple categorization (in De vulgari eloquentia) of poetry as salus, Venus, and virtus, the author analyzes sample diction like salus and saluto/Salute, and cor/coratge and cuore/coraggio in Bertran de Born and Dante and more specifically the latter’s use of saluto/salute (vs. salus) in the Vita Nuova to distinguish how Dante raises the sense of such terms and their love-context beyond the terrestrial plane of the Provencal poet.

Sketches an analysis of the third canzone of the Convivio as the last major lyric of the “stil novo,” presented by Dante in an express change of style—plain, though difficult and subtle, not allegorical, in keeping with the poet’s didactic purpose of treating “gentilezza.” Following his analysis from the standpoint of style, structure, accompanying commentary, and larger literary context, the author concludes that the poem, like those of the Vita Nuova, gains depth and clarity of meaning from the prose commentary, and also from the greater literary context, in this case marked by echoes of Plato’s Symposium, Aristotle’s Ethics, Thomas Aquinas’ Summa Theologica, Boethius’ Consolation of Philosophy, two poems of Cavalcanti, and Guinizelli’s Al Cor Gentil.

Treats comprehensively James Joyce’s indebtedness to Dante, stressing that Joyce read Dante as a poet, rather than as a Catholic, was interested in Dante’s criticism of society and especially in his powers of innovation, and created a Dantean allegory of art in his own fiction.

Re-examining various problems in the relationship between the Roman and the Commedia, the author considers the latter complementary to the former “rather than antagonistic toward it,” does not find persuasive Contini’s and Vanossi’s attribution of the Fiore to Dante, recognizes poetological affinities and parallels between the Roman and the Commedia. Contents: Introduction; 1. The Emergence of Italian as a Literary Language: The Problem of the Fiore and the Influence of the Roman de la Rose; 2. The Translatio Topos and Dante; 3. Textual Parallelism between the Rose and the Commedia; Conclusion: Bibliography of Works Cited. The monograph represents a reworking of the author’s dissertation at Princeton University, “Dante’s Commedia and Its Vernacular Narrative Context” (1978).

Includes, with minor changes, a portion of a longer study, “Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio and the Problem of Suicide” (Romanic Review, LXVII [1976], 200-225; see Dante Studies, XXCV, 170-171), as a section, “Dante’s Interpretation of Suicide” (pp.22-25), of an introductory part on the Western heritage. Other parts of the book are: The Middle Ages; The Early and High Renaissance; From the Counter Reformation Era to the Age of Enlightenment; The Late Eighteenth and Early Nineteenth Centuries; The Latter Nineteenth Century; and the Twentieth Century; Index.

Doctoral dissertation, Universität Munster, 1970. 199 p. (The artist group, the Nazarenes, and their illustrations of Dante.)

Contends that Dante conceives of Henry VII in the Commedia as recapitulating the expectation, mission, and ultimate fate of Marcellus as he is presented by Virgil in Aeneid VI, but with a difference. Although each poet prophesies the coming of an ideal imperial savior and describes the personal failure of his enterprise through an untimely and unexpectedly early death, Dante’s vision of Henry’s eventual seat in the White Rose (Par. XXX, 133 ff.) “corrects” the inadequacy of the Virgilian vision by attaching to Henry the idea of Christian Hope. The connection depends in part on the numerical symmetry of the allusion to Marcellus (Manibus,... oh, date lilia plenis) and the reference to Henry’s seat in the thirtieth cantos of the Purgatorio and Paradiso, respectively.

Review-article on recent Dantean studies: J.A. Scott, Dante magnanimo: Studi sulla “Commedia” (six pieces on Dante; see Dante Studies, XCIII, 178); Richard Kay, Dante’s Swift and Strong (see Dante Studies, XCII, 171-172); Giuseppe Mazzotta, Dante, Poet of the Desert (see Dante Studies, XCIII, 168-169); R.L. Montgomery, The Reader’s Eye: Studies in Didactic Literary Theory from Dante to Tasso (see Dante Studies, XCIII, 169); Studien zu Dante ... [etc.]. Festschrift für Rudolf Palgen (includes eleven essays of Dantean interest by various European scholars); and Dante’s Rime, translated by P.S. Diehl (see Dante Studies, XCIII, 160). The six items are also listed separately below, under Reviews.

Considers Arnaut’s speech, exceptionally in Provencal (Purg. XXVI, 139-147), as representing all courtly lyric, and interprets folor as Arnaut’s error in love, dolor as his failure in divine love, and valor as Dante’s example of a soul ready to apprehend divine love. Arnaut burns now, that his soul may understand the highest love.

Glosses indico legno in the passage, Purg. VII, 73-78, as a special color “blue” based on Dante’s close acquaintance with the activities of artist friends and his first-hand knowledge of the Val d’Elsa, source of the color material as referred to also in Cennino Cennini’s art manual, Libro dell’arte (1396-1427?).

Relying much on Saussurian linguistics, e.g., the theory of signs and referentiality and specifically the tenet that referentiality respects difference, the author analyzes in these very terms Dante’s treatment in the Divine Comedy of signs and their falsifications in relation to the originals, with particular reference to the relative significance of Canto XXX in each of the three cantiche, in order to illustrate Chaucer’s indebtedness to Dante in his own treatment of these matters in Troylus and Criseyde.

Contains a chapter on “Thieves and Suicides in the Inferno: Metamorphosis as the State of Sin” (pp. 114-128 and 232-234), in which he interprets the significance and implications of Dante’s representation of the thieves (Inf. XXIV-XXV) and the suicides (Inf. XIII) as they are metamorphosed in their infernal state, within the context of the book’s general theme of exploring the deeper meaning of famous examples of metamorphosis in literature. After a close analysis of the two episodes in question, the author concludes that, while Dante utilizes an Ovidian vocabulary to express a kindred view of the problematic relation of minds and bodies, his is a qualified one where the human condition is the malum damni, which is the evil of loss, or existential rift the soul suffers in its voluntary exile from grace. “As with his pagan models, Dante saves the fantasy of transformation from phantasmagoric triviality by exposing the philosophical nerve of the unease it generates.”

Doctoral dissertation, Columbia University, 1980. 222 p. (Examines how different concepts of time and meaning determine different ways of constructing narrative, with examples drawn from the Odyssey, Book of Exodus, Gospel of Mark, the Inferno, and Paradise Regained.

Examines critically the essential theses of Dante’s Monarchia, relating them to Aristotelian thought via Thomism while indicating where Dante differs from St. Thomas and St. Augustine. Only by evading a basic teleological and theological inconsistency can Dante separate the political from the ultimate end and focus with some originality on the means for achieving the perfection of our earthly life.

Reprint of the study, which previously appeared in Yearbook of Italian Studies, IV (1980), 87-104. (See Dante Studies, XCIX, 194.)

Contends that Paul Claudel’s profound interest in Dante’s poetry stemmed, according to evidence in his Journal, not from the didactic substance, but primarily the aesthetic délectation in the effect he sought to achieve in his own work of visibile parlare, seen as affecting the reader’s paradis intérieur, which is exemplified in Dante’s purgatorial bas-reliefs (Purg. X, 94-102).

Finds specific Dantean echoes and parallels in Petrarch’s canzone (Canzoniere, CXXVI), for example, “le belle membra” (V. 2)—Purgatorio XXXI, 50, and “sola a me par donna” (V. 3)—a play on “donna m’apparve” (Purg. XXX, 32), along with the cloud of flowers common to both passages, not to mention the generally pastoral setting of earthly paradise and the purgatorial tension centered on the lady in both instances. The author contends that, read against the episode in Purgatorio XXX-XXXI, the canzone reveals Petrarch’s knowledge in depth of the Commedia and his felt need to distinguish his own poetry from that of Dante, while also underscoring his well-known inability to abandon the human in favor of the divine.

Focuses on the differences between the Vita Nuova and the Canzoniere, particularly as to content and form. With an implied critique of its predecessor, Petrarch’s lyric sequence reflects a whole lifetime, with the author focusing on the moral self in his lovesickness and making of fragmentation, or the book’s varietas, its modus tractandi and implying resistance to an imposed form; it therefore reflects the limited human psyche in the world, whereas Dante’s libello, unified and structured analogically upon God’s Book, is a model of the cosmos. Contrasting with the continuity of Dante’s itinerarium, Petrarch’s Canzoniere exhibits a dissidio in presenting the fragmented moral self in its parts that constantly elude the author’s upwardly striving endeavors towards reconciliation. Petrarch’s model, which seems to have self-consciously departed from that of Dante’s libello, became the cyclopedic exemplar of Renaissance lyric collections, because of its openendedness and greater possibilities of formal inventiveness.

In the context of his theme that Chaucer is a poet as well as representative of the tradition, the author includes a discussion of his relation to Dante, whom he took, along with the classical poets, not only as a standard, but also as a model in unique ways.

Examines three seminal allegories of the philosophical tradition in the late Middle Ages: Bernard Silvestris’ Cosmographia, based on the theory of opposites and focused on the natural world, Alain de Lille’s De planctu naturae, centering on the correlation of opposites in the human mind, and Jean de Meun’s Roman de la Rose, which dramatizes the whole strategy. This development is traced from Platonic dualism, e.g., of light and darkness, good and evil, Being and Becoming, in the framework of the universe, and eventually between the One and all other things. The author concludes briefly with the transformation of the various allegorical approaches in the Divine Comedy, where the drama of the mind coincides with the panorama of the world.

Points out various ways in which the Commedia reflects St. Augustine’s figurative astronomy and thereby, directly and indirectly, also the gifts of the Holy Spirit, long thought to be unrepresented in the poem. Particular exegetical attention is given to Dante’s elaboration of the idea of pacem sine vespera (Par. II), to his figures of fire and wind (Par. I and Inf. XXXIV), and to his use of the sun, moon, and stars (esp. Inf. I and XX, Purg. XIII and XVIII), as well as correlation of the gifts of the Spirit, the virtues, and beatitudes. The author also addresses Dante’s handling, in the light of Augustinian figurative astronomy, the distinction of sapientia and scientia and general symbolism of the sun and moon.

Recognizes that Dante read Augustine’s Confessions as both theological tract and personal autobiography, and notes parallels between this account and Dante’s own spiritual itinerary in elaboration of John Freccero’s consideration of the poet’s spiritual autobiography in the Commedia “as essentially Augustinian in structure.” The author specifically elaborates the derivation of the three images of “the region of unlikeness” (as a state of alienation from God), the forested mountaintop (as mount of philosophical pride), and the image of the forest alone (as the vice of curiosity). The images are further associated with Dante’s Ulysses as a figure of pride and curiosity, indeed the poet constructed the Inferno as an incarnation of curiosity, even to reflecting the transformation of the forest image into a sea image as found in the Confessions. Notably, however, Dante separated the mountain from the forest at the start of the Commedia, describing it in positive terms, in order to present it inverted at the end of the Purgatorio, suggesting the salvation of philosophy. In his reworking of Augustinian symbolism, as a poet Dante, unlike Augustine, is seen synthetically to achieve coherence between corporeal sign and spiritual meaning signified, thus producing a more consistent system of biblical symbols, by resolving instances of both negative and positive functions associated with them. In the end, through the creative medium of poetry and his programmatic concern for the literal sense, Dante succeeded in achieving fidelity to his art, to Scripture, and to St. Augustine through “a creative exercise of spatial imagination.”

Doctoral dissertation, University of Pittsburgh, 1980. 203 p. (Stresses Eliot’s indebtedness to Dante’s Comedy, especially in the Four Quartets.)

Reviews

La Divina Commedia. A cura di Umberto Bosco e Giovanni Reggio. Firenze: Le Monnier, 1979. 3 v. Reviewed by:

[Anon.], in Choice, XVIII (March, 1981), 959;

Peter Heinegg, in Christian Century, XCVIII (15 April 1981), 427-428;

Dante’s Purgatory Translated with notes and commentary by Mark Musa. Illustrated by Richard M. Powers. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1981. (See above, under Translations.) Reviewed by:

Gabriele Muresu, in Rassegna della letteratura italiana, LXXXV, No. 3 (1981), 561-562;

[Anon.] in Choice, XVIII, No. 8 (Romance Philology, XXXIV, “Special Issue” (1981), 1106;

Aldo S. Bernardo, in Renaissance Quarterly, XXXIV, No. 2 (1981), 218-222;

Blomme, Raoul. Studi per una triplice esperienza del Dante minore. Ghent, 1978. Reviewed by:

Gabriele Muresu, in Rassegna della letteratura italiana, LXXXV, No. 3 (1981), 562.

Dante Studies, XCVII (1979). Reviewed by:

   Glauco Cambon, in Italian Quarterly, XXII, No. 84 (1981), 109-110;

Fortin, E.L. Dissidence et philosophie au moyen âge: Dante et ses antécédents. Montreal: Les Editions Bellarmin, 1981. (See above, under Studies.) Reviewed by:

Hollander, Robert. Studies in Dante. Ravenna: Longo Editore, 1980. (See Dante Studies, XCIX, 183-184.) Reviewed by:

Gabriele Muresu, in Rassegna della letteratura italiana, LXXXV, No. 3 (1981), 565-566.

Kay, Richard. Dante’s Swift and Strong: Essays on Inferno” XV. Lawrence, Kans.: University of Kansas Press, 1978. (See Dante Studies, XCVII, 171-172 and 180, and XCIX, 197.) Reviewed by:

Dino S. Cervigni, in Forum Italicum, XV, No. 1 (1981), 85-87;

Kirkpatrick, Robin. Dante’s “Paradiso” and the Limitations of Modern Criticism: A Study of Style and Poetic Theory. Cambridge, England; New York, N.Y.: Cambridge University Press, 1978. (See Dante Studies, XCVIII, 184-185, also 178 and 189.) Reviewed by:

Teodolinda Barolini, in Romance Philology, XXXV, No. 2 (1981), 409-413.

Lansing, Richard H. From Image to Idea: A Study of the Simile in Dante’s “Commedia.” Ravenna: Longo Editore, 1977. (See Dante Studies, XCVI, 227, XCVIII, 178, and XCIX, 198.) Reviewed by:

Aldo Scaglione, in Romance Philology, XXXIV, “Special Issue” (February), 32-46.

on “Dante’s Esthetic of Grace and the Reader’s Imagination” (p. 50-92). (See Dante Studies, XC VIII, 169.) Reviewed by:

Michael Murrin, in Modern Language Quarterly, XLII, No. 2 (1981), 192-194;

N. Jonard, in Revue des études italiennes, XXVII, Nos. 2-3 (1981), 269-270;

Albert N. Mancini, in Modern Philology, LXXVIII, No. 3 (1981), 335-337.

Picone, Michelangelo. “I trovatori di Dante: Bertran de Born.” In Studi e problemi di critica testuale, XIX (Oct. 1979), 71-94. (See Dante Studies, XCIX, 207.) Reviewed by:

Scott, John A. Dante magnanimo: Studi sulla “Commedia.” Firenze: Leo S. Olschki, 1977. Contains six studies—five previously published and one new. (See Dante Studies, XCVIII, 178.) Reviewed by:

Simon. Graz: Universitäts-Buchdruckerei Styria, 1971. 235 p. (Veröffentlichungen der Hugo Schuchardtsche Malwinenstiftung Graz, Nr. 3.) Contains eleven essays of Dantean interest by various European scholars. Reviewed by:

Waller, Marguerite R. Petrarch’s Poetics and Literary History. Amherst, Mass.: The University of Massachusetts Press, 1980. Contains substantial reference to Dante, passim. (See Dante Studies, XCIX, 195.) Reviewed by:

Aldo S. Bernardo, in Renaissance Quarterly, XXXIV, No. 4 (1981), 560-565;